My Son Married A Lazy Woman

Dear Deep Essence,

My son got married recently. He had known his wife for a year before they got married. I advised him not to marry her because I thought she was lazy. However, he didn't listen and married her any way. Now, my son is the one who has to deal with her. She doesn't even cook or help out around the house. My son is always tired and irritated. I have asked my daughter-in-law to help out and she says she does help out. But I never see her doing anything. What should I do?

AQSA ZAREEN FAROOQUI

A Frustrated Mother.

Dear Frustrated,

I have a feeling you may not like what I have to say but here it is.

Don't do anything. You have already taken all the necessary steps. You have suggested, advised and encouraged but unfortunately it hasn't worked. You have your son's best interests at heart but your son is not a child anymore. He made a choice to marry someone, (I am assuming this is a love marriage) after getting to know her really well. He probably knew she did not like doing household chores.

When a couple marries, they make a choice (whether they know it or not), to accept the good and the bad in a person. However, many people get married in the hopes that they will change the one thing they don't like about their spouse. The problem is the more they focus on the perceived flaw, the bigger it becomes.

Furthermore, it's imperative that the two people in the relationship resolve the conflict. Often, third parties, even with the best of intentions increase the misunderstandings between the couple. Sometimes, they end up feeling blamed for the conflict.

So, I would suggest that you either help your son out (when ever you can) or stay out of it. On the other hand, if your son asks you for help, then refer him to an objective third party, such as a religious community member or a therapist.

Take care,
Deep Essence
